

This Is What the Northern Lights Look Like From Space

Written by Meredith Carey • November 13, 2015

11 PHOTOS

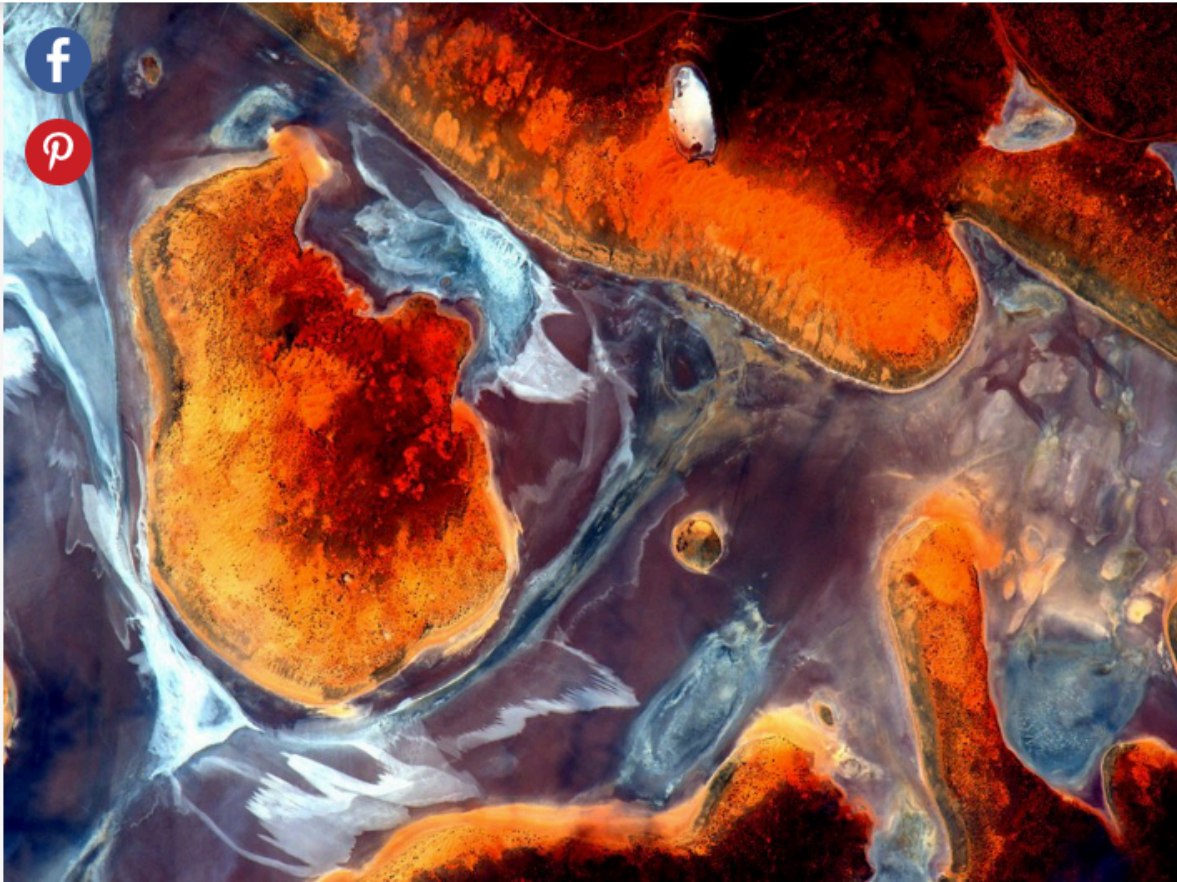

We've all seen photos from NASA's Hubble Space Telescope, but astronauts aren't just focused on the great beyond. The shuttles and scopes often point toward home, creating some incredible footage of our own planet. View the Northern Lights and other natural wonders from a different angle.

Nothing like a morning shot of the aurora borealis to wake you up. This picture was taken from the International Space Station.

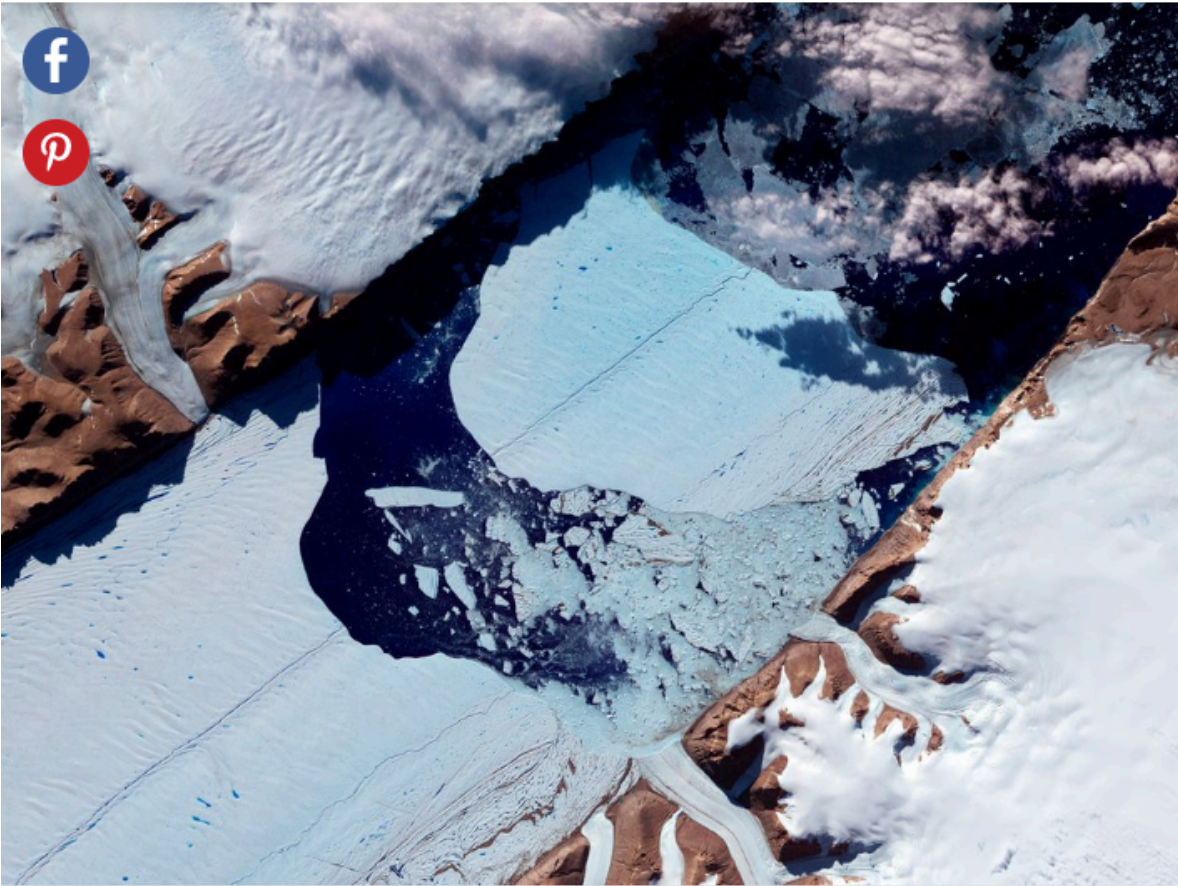

The Northern Lights might be beautiful from Earth, but this aurora over the South Pole is absolutely breathtaking.

Astronaut Scott Kelly captured this image during a flyover of Australia from the International Space Station this year.

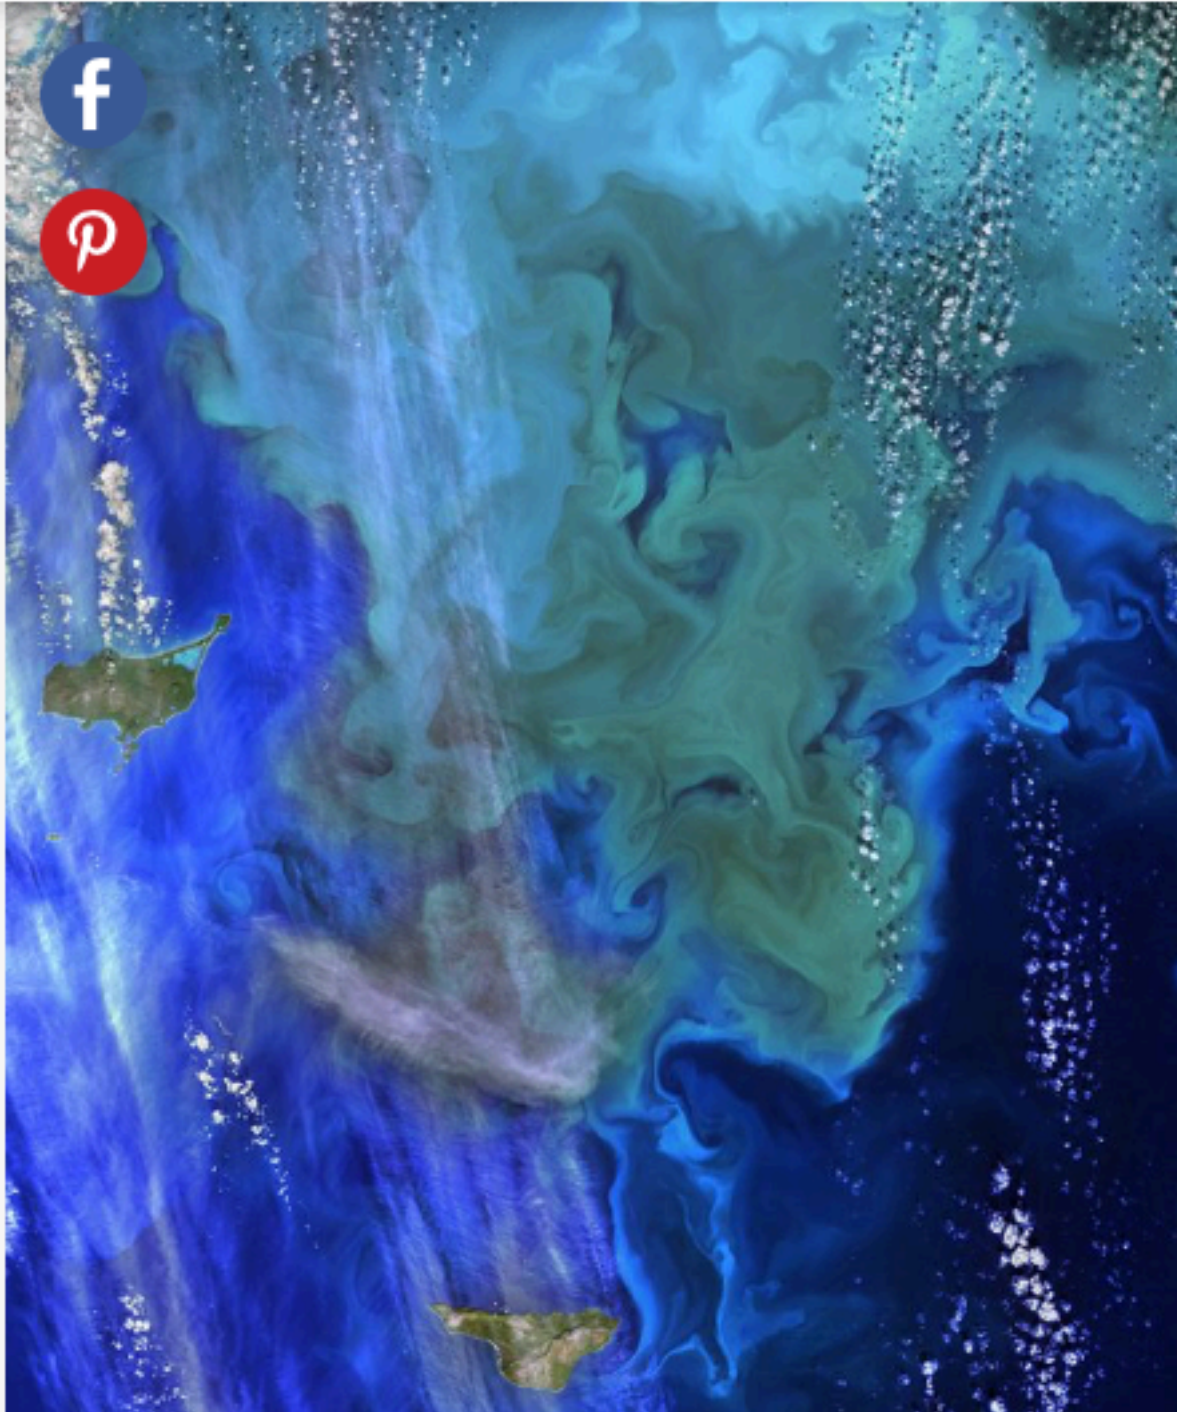

This watercolor view is in fact the Tassili n'Ajjer National Park, a part of the Sahara, where the rocky outcroppings are in stark contrast to the desert sand.

In the summer of 2012, NASA captured this break in the Petermann Glacier in Greenland, which eventually became a giant floating iceberg.

This photo, taken from the International Space Station, captures storm clouds hovering over the Atlantic Ocean near Brazil.

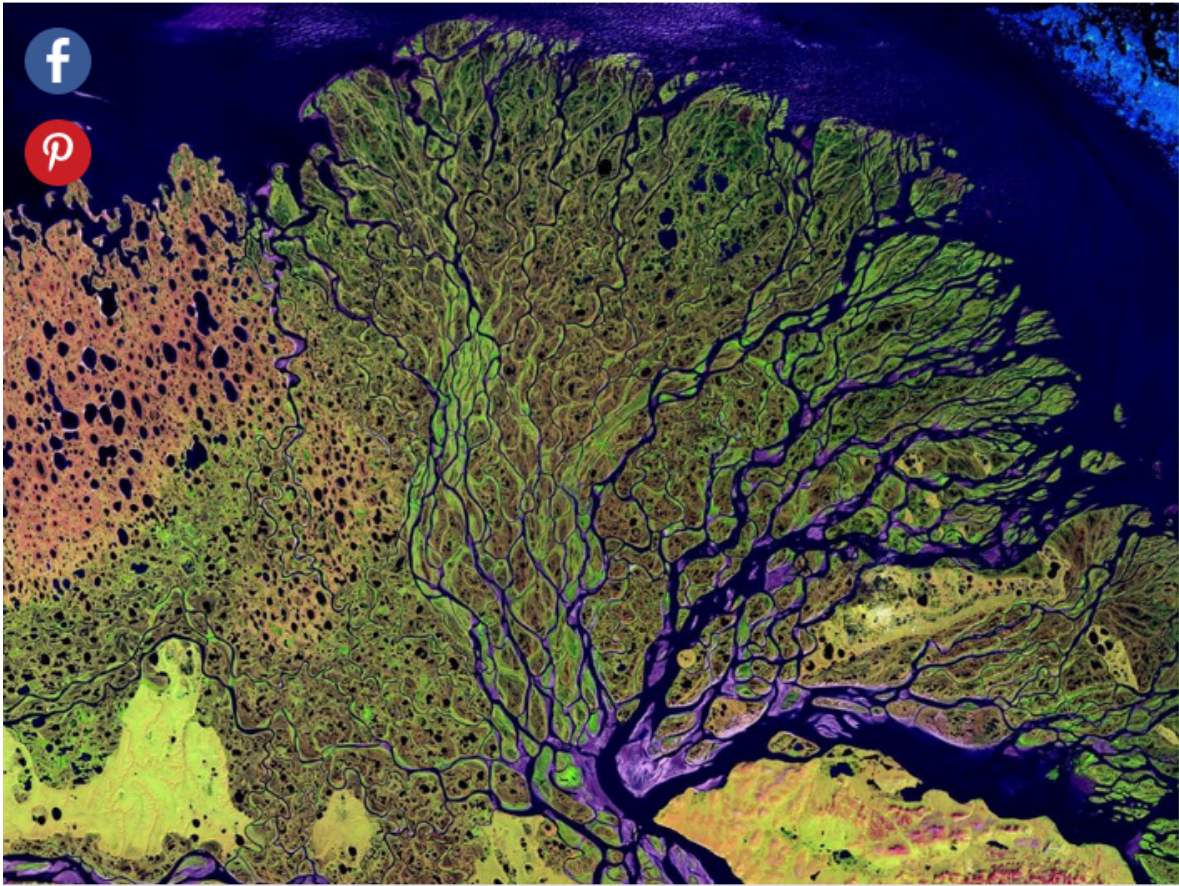

This phytoplankton bloom was captured off the coast of Iceland in the Norwegian Sea.

Astronaut Scott Kelly snapped this photo during a nighttime flyover of the seemingly lava-filled Nile; its glow comes from the Egyptian cities bordering the river.

This false-color composite was made using shortwave infrared, infrared, and red wavelengths to create some incredible views of Western Australia's Lake Carnegie.

This photo of Siberia's easternmost river captures the Lena Delta Wildlife Reserve, home to a refuge for most of Siberia's wildlife.

The windswept valleys in Northern Africa were the perfect subject for Alexander Gerst, a European flight engineer on the International Space Station in 2014.

Fuente: <http://www.cntraveler.com/galleries/2015-07-13/visiting-the-most-beautiful-island-in-the-world-palawan-philippines/1>